

WOMEN AND WATER:

The Social Costs of Women as the World's Main Water-Bearers

-presented by the new TRACESpuren intern, Anna Overla.

Sunday, 24 June, in Erfurt

About 2.1 billion people around the world do not have access to in-home running water and must rely upon daily efforts to fetch water from a variety of sources around their areas. The task of fetching water falls disproportionately onto women and girls and has serious impacts on perpetuating global gender inequalities.

In her talk 'Women and Water', Central College [in Pella, Iowa] student turned TRACESpuren summer intern, Anna Overla, explores the world wide societal impacts of women's interconnectivity to water, what problems such women face and how to best address their issues.
